Once in a quiet sunny town of Kenwood, a quiet child Al was growing up. Every morning after breakfast he went for a walk to the river near the old yellow field. It stretched along the bank. Blue clouds brightly reflected sun rays in the sky. Al was such a kind boy that he periodically left for his magical world. Playing near the water he imagined himself to be a hero of fairy tales, where on the ship he fights with a huge dragon, spewing a stream of fire. The dragonfly obediently sat in his hands and seemed to represent itself in the form of a winged character.

The boy's father was a simple fisherman. The boy's mother has long left this world. Kissing her son goodbye, she gave him infinite love and light. And thousands of little fairies spun around Al and wrapped him in their magic. Father often came home late. When there was a good catch, the boy often played with fish and squid. The sea world came to life in the hands of a five-year-old child, and everyone proceeded to their roles. The big fish was the main king, the smaller one – subjects, and the squid and shrimp – attacking the kingdom. Father watched the boy believe in his fantasies, and only encouraged his fiction.
